hidden latency. A recent internal audit at a manufacturing client revealed that employees spent an average of 1.5 hours a day navigating between platforms—a productivity drain that translates into missed deadlines and inflated overhead. This fragmentation also hampers visibility. When sales, finance, and operations cannot share a single source of truth, decision-makers rely on stale spreadsheets, increasing the risk of error and slowing strategic response. Simi's platform consolidates the most common business layers—customer relationship, project tracking, and performance analytics—into a modular interface. Rather than forcing every department onto a single monolith, the solution lets teams enable only the modules they need, preserving flexibility while delivering consistency. Built-in connectors automatically push updates between modules, eliminating manual exports. For example, when a sales rep closes a deal, the revenue entry instantly appears in the finance dashboard, triggering budget alerts without a single spreadsheet. Managers see high-level KPIs, while frontline staff get task-specific views. The same underlying data powers both layers, ensuring everyone talks about the same numbers.
