Busy attorneys and court clerks in Harnett County are confronting a familiar bottleneck: overlapping hearings, missed deadlines, and last-minute rescheduling that drains billable hours. Recent consultations with seasoned court administrators reveal a handful of practical tactics that can transform chaotic docket sheets into predictable, actionable calendars. Most practitioners point to three recurring issues. First, the reliance on manual spreadsheets leads to version-control nightmares when multiple parties edit the same file. Second, a lack of standardized notification protocols means judges, lawyers, and jurors often learn about changes at the eleventh hour. Third, the absence of a centralized view of county-wide events creates inadvertent conflicts with municipal meetings or local elections. Seasoned court managers recommend a three-step framework that can be rolled out within weeks, not months. Transition from isolated spreadsheets to a single, cloud-based docket system—preferably one that integrates with the North Carolina Judicial Branch's eFiling portal. The key is to enforce a "single source of truth" rule: only the designated calendar manager may edit the master schedule, while everyone else receives read-only links. Set up rule-based notifications that trigger 48 hours before a hearing, 24 hours before any amendment, and again the morning of the event.
