contract may also specify any restrictions on subleasing, decorating the property, or using certain amenities. Upon signing the lease, you'll typically be required to pay a deposit (dep sito) equivalent to 2-3 months' rent. This amount is usually refundable at the end of the lease, but you may forfeit it if you fail to fulfill your obligations as a tenant. You may also be asked to provide a document called an 'informe de ocupaci n,' which confirms your rental history and employment status. When planning to end your lease, you'll typically need to provide written notice (carta de desalojo) to your landlord, specifying your intention to vacate the property and the date of your departure. If you're unsure about the specific requirements of your lease, it's a good idea to consult with a local real estate agent or lawyer. As a tenant in Spain, you're generally responsible for maintaining the property, including paying for minor repairs and replacing any broken items. However, if the property is in disrepair or the landlord fails to address any issues, you may be able to negotiate rent reduction or other concessions.
