managers can apply proven tactics without overhauling their entire architecture. Many platforms default to a “first-come, first-served” model that neglects the nuances of human attention. Three typical mistakes emerge: Uniform pacing: Delivering every item at the same interval disregards user fatigue. Inconsistent relevance: Relying on a single engagement metric (clicks or likes) can misrepresent true interest. Overbroad filtering: Applying a blanket “popular content” rule excludes niche interests that could spark viral loops. Users gravitate toward novelty, but timing is everything. Forma’s data shows that inserting a fresh post every 3–5 interactions keeps the feed’s perceived freshness high without causing overload. ...
