Assuming a course listed online will remain open until your registration window is a mistake that costs students every. Key insight: Seats marked as "available" during early registration windows sometimes reflect projected openings rather than confirmed sections. Always verify with the department directly if a course is central to your plan. Mistake 1: Ignoring cross-listing patterns. Many Fordham courses appear under multiple department codes. A sociology seminar might also carry an American studies designation. Failing to recognize this means you might accidentally register for the wrong section—or worse, hit a credit limit you didn't anticipate because the system counts it differently than expected. Mistake 2: Skipping the syllabus preview. Fordham instructors often post preliminary syllabi or reading lists before the semester starts. Students who skip this step miss critical workload comparisons. A three-credit philosophy course might require twice the weekly reading of a four-credit history seminar. Credit hours don't always predict effort.
