The FAFSA Simplification Act 2021 replaced EFC - expected family contribution with SAI - The primary goal of completing the FAFSA is to secure This will outline a few steps you can take if What are you expected to pay for college? Learn what College finances hinge on the Student Aid Index (SAI), the number federal calculators use to gauge eligibility for grants, workâ€™study, and loans. A misread SAI can shave thousands off a familyâ€™s aid package, while an accurate, chartâ€™driven review often uncovers hidden eligibility and shields students from overâ€™borrowing. This article walks valueâ€™focused buyers through the context, common pitfalls, and a stepâ€™byâ€™step decision framework that leverages a detailed SAI chart to keep budgets on target. The SAI replaces the older Expected Family Contribution (EFC) but serves the same purpose: it translates household income, assets, and family size into a single figure that schools use to allocate aid. Because federal and many institutional formulas begin with the SAI, a lower index typically translates into larger Pell grants, more need-based scholarships, and reduced loan amounts. For families on a tight budget, every point in the index can mean a difference of $2,000-$5,000 in available aid, directly affecting.

Misreporting asset values. Families often list the full market price of a home or a vehicle, not the allowable net equity, leading to an overstated index.

Overlooking special circumstances. Dependents with disabilities, recent job loss, or a parent's military service can qualify for adjustments, yet applicants frequently omit these qualifiers. Failing to update FAFSA after life changes. A change in household income, a new sibling, or a scholarship award after the initial filing can be recorded too late, leaving the SAI stuck at an outdated figure. Each error erodes the financial aid envelope and can push students toward higher-interest private loans—something most value-driven families aim to avoid. How do colleges decide how much If you're income decreased in the year after the taxes that were required for the FAFSA then you need to report that as a special ...
