When you finish your NSW driver's licence test, the examiner hands you a score sheet that looks like a report card but contains specific details about each section of the test. Understanding this sheet is essential for knowing whether you passed, where you need improvement, and what your next steps should be. Each score sheet is divided into three main parts: the Street Rules section, the Defensive Driving section, and the Overall Result box. Every row lists a skill or manoeuvre that you were evaluated on, along with a Correct or Incorrect mark and a numeric score out of 10. At the bottom, a total score and a pass/fail indicator appear. 1. Street Rules (50 %) – This is the most heavily weighted part of the test. You must score at least 80 % of the 50 points to pass this section. Common items include

4. Contextual Analysis (Continued)

obeying traffic lights, lane-keeping, and correct use of turn signals. 2. Defensive Driving (30 %) – Here the examiner checks how safely you respond to hazards. A minimum of 70 % of the 30 points is required. Pay close attention to sections on checking mirrors, maintaining a safe distance, and handling sudden stops. 3. Vehicle Controls (20 %) – This tests your technical handling, such as parking, reversing, and using the handbrake. You need at least 70 % of these 20 points. A low score here may still allow you to pass if the other sections compensate. The overall score is the sum of all three sections. If you cross 80 % of the total 100 points, the examiner will write PASS next to your name. If you fall below that threshold, the sheet will show FAIL and a brief comment indicating the lowest scoring area. Okay we haven't done one of these in a while this is a
